Martin Luther King, Jr. once said, "Love is the only force capable of transforming an enemy into a friend." To be honest, I don't think that I have ever had an actual enemy on this earth. Don't get me wrong, there have been and probably still are some people that don't necessarily like my personality or the way I may have handled certain issues in the past. They may not care for how loud I am or how often I make jokes. They may not agree with the things I have committed my life to, but to say someone has been a true enemy that only wants to see my demise is not something I can do. If they exist, they haven't let me know. Martin Luther King, Jr. had enemies, public and private. They didn't like who he was. They didn't like the message he proclaimed, and they didn't like his views on how our society should unite despite racial differences. Martin Luther King, Jr. had enemies to the point that he was killed simply for being who God called him to be. Even in the midst of such confrontation, opposition, and flat out hatred, he still preached and lived a message of love conquering all. In reflecting on his life, I find myself questioning the message my life shares at times. Do I, a man with no real enemies or opposition, proclaim and share love at every opportunity?

As pastor and parents, we must make sure the example we set is worthy of our students copying, because whether we like it or not, that is exactly what will happen. I find myself more and more each day doing things just like my dad. It's weird and scary So, parents, I leave you with this challenge, set an example worthy of being copied.
